You are invited to the STTC Conference 2017

Thursday 21 September 2017, Aarhus (Denmark)

Sustainably sourced tropical timber – selling a positive story
A European Networking Event

The European Sustainable Tropical Timber Coalition (STTC) Conference 2017 will be the opportunity to learn how to sell the positive story that sustainably sourced tropical timber has to tell; to discuss the challenges, share knowledge and best practice with colleagues from across Europe on marketing the material to a range of audiences. It will also be a great opportunity to network with buyers, suppliers and specifiers.

The STTC Conference 2017 will be under the expert guidance of keynote speaker Nigel Hollis, Executive Vice President of and Chief Global Analyst of market researchers Kantar Millward Brown, and moderator Peter Woodward of Quest Associates.

It will explore how to improve the image of sustainably sourced tropical timber and market it as a rich and diverse resource that contributes to forest conservation – and do that in a way that appeals to specifiers, end users and consumers.

Interested in seeing the city you are visiting from a sustainably sourced tropical timber perspective? Aarhus is among the cities with the highest, most diverse use of tropical timber in every day and iconic use. On September 20th, delegates can join an FSC Denmark-organised tour to the most interesting construction applications and other uses of tropical timber in the city. Meet the construction companies and designers behind the projects and learn why they chose sustainably sourced tropical timber.

The tour will end in the spectacular settings of Aarhus harbor, where the European STTC and FSC Denmark invite you to a networking dinner.

STTC – the background
The STTC launched late 2013 in Amsterdam against a background of falling European tropical timber imports, convened and supported by IDH Sustainable Trade Initiative. Its aim was to halt and reverse this trend, while increasing the market share of sustainably sourced tropical timber.

One factor in European consumption decline was the international economic crisis. But there was broad consensus that tropical timber’s poor environmental image was also an issue; a point confirmed at the 2016 STTC conference, ‘Real impact through timber purchasing policies’. Effective campaigning by NGOs on tropical deforestation and illegal logging had combined with lack of market awareness of the benefits of using sustainably sourced tropical timber. The result was to deter many consumers and specifiers from using the material at all and it was switched for alternatives across the market.

It was feared this unnecessary substitution could, in turn, lead to tropical timber suppliers turning to other, less environmentally concerned buyers than Europe. It might even result in forest conversion to other uses.

The role of the STTC is to boost awareness, specification and use of sustainably sourced tropical wood. The aim is to increase European sales to 50% above 2013 levels by 2020. Since its launch, Coalition partners and participants have worked on a range of initiatives to improve tropical timber’s market image. They have focused on areas such as sustainably sourced material’s carbon benefits and life cycle analysis and based their arguments on the facts.

The 2017 Conference will be yet another milestone in the STTC’s efforts to boost European imports of sustainably sourced tropical timber and, as a result, support growth in sustainable forest management in tropical countries.
